At the helm of this tumultuous conflict stood two enigmatic figures: Mao Zedong, Chairman of the Communist Party of China, and Joseph Stalin, leader of the Soviet Union. This book offers an unprecedented glimpse into their strategic calculations, personal ambitions, and the ideological fervor that fueled their actions.

Through meticulously researched accounts and firsthand testimonies, we witness the complexities of Mao's decision-making. His unwavering belief in the spread of communism abroad and his desire to strengthen China's geopolitical position played a pivotal role in his decision to intervene in the Korean War.

On the other side of the ideological divide, Stalin's motivations were equally multifaceted. His aims to expand Soviet influence in the Far East and weaken his American rivals drove his cautious support for North Korea's invasion. Yet, as the war progressed, his reluctance to engage in direct confrontation revealed the limits of his ambitions.
